In this episode, Matt Lopez, Arizona State University vice president of Academic Enterprise Enrollment, provided FOX 10 Phoenix morning anchor Syleste Rodriguez a behind-the-scenes tour of ASU London, which offers six degrees, five in engineering and technology and one in business management. Through its accelerated degree pathway, qualified students can earn a U.K. bachelor's degree and a U.S. master's degree in four years.

ASU London is located at Northampton Square on the Clerkenwell campus of City St George's, University of London. Lopez explained that one of the most distinctive aspects of the learning experience is the absence of traditional lecture halls.

"We don't have big classrooms with hundreds of students. Here, everything is learned by doing. Students are literally learning how to be an engineer by touching, by feeling, by doing," Lopez said.

The enrollment for fall 2026 is 320 students, including some from Arizona.

During the visit, ASU London hosted a hackathon where students worked together to develop solutions to a challenge. The event also gave new students — from the U.S., London, elsewhere in the U.K. and other countries — an opportunity to get to know one another before classes began.

“What we’re trying to design here is that we think of our human and societal problems as world problems that we solve together. We have to get different people, different backgrounds working together,” Lopez said.

Shelby Connell, a business management student from Scottsdale, Arizona, who attended Chaparral High School, explained why she chose ASU London.

“I’ve always been in Arizona my whole life, and my whole family went to ASU, and I wanted to try something new,” she said. “And when I heard about ASU London, it felt like the right option for me to do something different, live in a new city, live in Europe and travel. And all of the things I’ve seen at ASU London right now are amazing.”

She added, “I’ve only been here for five days, and I’ve met people from Brazil, Dubai and India and multiple from the U.K., and you don’t experience that in Tempe as much. And so it’s been amazing just to see all the different cultures.”
